The program aims to develop in students scholarly research, writing skills, teaching ability, and communication skills in the areas of philosophy, political philosophy, ethics, and African American philosophy. There are no requirements for program admission. The primary methodology used to study philosophical problems is the method of reflective analysis. This method has been characterized as consisting of the use of analysis, synthesis, and critical review of existing knowledge. The students read classical and contemporary texts, do original research, and engage in discussions on philosophical topics. Students also engage in independent study and in special projects. The program has produced 22 graduates since its beginning in 1985. There are currently 16 students in the program. Eleven students are pursuing the degree, two are pursuing master's degrees in philosophy and the other three students are working towards the B.A. in philosophy.
